Gray Catbird

Not every gray catbird feels the need to migrate south. A few are comfortable overwintering where they have shelter and food. We are fortunate to have one that seems to appreciate the comfort of spending time beneath the boxwood on the south side of our small patio and availing himself of seeds and suet.

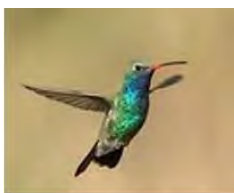

I tend to believe that this is the same bird that has stayed year-round for the last three years. It might not be, but I think that it may be one member of a pair that successfully nests elsewhere in the yard.

The catbird eyes the suet feeder. The catbird prefers to land on the top of the feeder and reach over to the suet.
